35 Tips Toward An E-Learning Plan For Your Organization

E-Learning Concepts and Techniques

The user's situation can be explained as the totality of an end-user's experience with a product (Evans, 2002), it encompasses the user activities of learning, doing, and producing (Johnson, 1998, p. 31) and the experiences the user encounters in those activities such as emotions, time, social context, etc. (Evans, 2002)

How can User-Centered Design be incorporated in the creation of e-learning?

After the need, target audience, and a basic e-learning solution have been determined the design process begins. This is a great opportunity to start actively involving the end-user of the learning in the design process. The initial step can be accomplished through various forms of inquiry each with its own advantages and disadvantages, such as interviews, focus groups, and questionnaires/surveys. Questions should focus on pre-design issues such as:

- Do you have any experience with the following e-learning platforms? Or please rate your experience with the following e-learning platforms.
- How would you accomplish the goal of this solution using e-learning?
- How do you learn best (include examples, such as short lessons vs. longer lessons, visually, case-studies, etc.)?
- What motivates you to learn?
- Include a pre-test of users' technology skills and experience with the e-learning content to be provided in the solution.

By no means is this list exhaustive. The goal is to include the users in the decision-making process. This may mean, as a designer, you need to educate the users on some e-
